It's still early days for the Apple Pencil but it instantly won me over. Just as I expected, it's perfect for drawing and sketching. Unlike a mouse, the Apple Pencil needs to be kept active by tapping the screen to move the point around the screen. But with this in mind, I would say that given its limited stylus size (0.7 inches) it's too demanding. I found, especially when moving a bigger area than a pixel, that it's easy to miss the finer details. I'm also worried about its ability to pick up existing strokes and the pressure sensitivity when drawing. Finally a brief mention about the myriad enhancements that have been introduced in Lightroom 8 for the iPad, including faster performance, improved memory use, improved search performance, new funnel workflow, cloud sync, database sharing, etc. While I have been able to explore these features a bit, I welcome other users to give more meaningful feedback. The test system was running on "machine type A9", and it had 32GB of RAM. The iPad Pro is running iOS 10, if that gives you an idea of the hardware used. I put all of the pen's pressure on into various layers within the above-mentioned "Adobe Photoshop Sketch" screen — there was no pressure sensitivity adjustment — and all this was supported and rendered perfectly, without any lags. I did not use any of the camera purchase options; the images below were simply crafted using the standard Control panel. Adobe's brushes, "Master Collection brushes" tend to make any photo look good. The library is fairly easy to navigate and find what you need. The Master Collection brushes can be applied to virtually any dimension, or can be extended by duplicating and transforming. This is probably the fastest way to create good-looking images, but it can also be excessively time-consuming. The Paint Bucket is here, and it can use a brush, but no, it does not allow you to create gradations. With the Brush tool, you can create gradations in a few steps.

In terms of the photo editing workflow, you can expect Photoshop to bring the best of 2D creation and editing to the web, including the use of native vector manipulation tools, a robust selection system, and a unique image compositing UI. The most important application of this new technology stack is the concept of a "native application" that runs on the GPU within the tab, along with the JavaScript-based Code Editor, CSS, and API access for the tool. These native applications are easier to build and are more stable for everyone, as there is no more run-time versioning. The transition to a "native application" for every tool provides a stable and secure environment for the Web and the long-term vision for the future of Photoshop and the rest of the Adobe family of tools. It also provides a more consistent experience in terms of the speed of the tool and the layers of the UI. Simply put, a native web application is not an iOS app, but it is unlike a traditional web page either, as it can appear in any browser window with no page refresh and a consistent look and feel. Being "native" in the platform also lets you choose to run the application in multiple locations on a single device, or in every location on a device (desktop, mobile, IoT, etc.). The next step in this evolution of the toolset is the new web application architecture, which leverages the emerging JavaScript-based UI Code Editor, CSS, and application API access to create a JavaScript-based application framework, which includes the ability to take code-based assets and build an immersive UI in the browser. It is built on the web-based tools and the browser-based operating system (OS) and was written to support any platform as well as any browser. This is the beginning of the process to make Photoshop a truly native application.
