The volume levels of your sound card can be controlled from your smartphone or tablet, thanks to a simple app called Soundcard Volume Control. The app has been developed by Varionym Technologies, who also made the app Ear Mute. The main feature of the app is its ability to detect which sound source you're using and adjust its level accordingly. The app has a limited number of features, but it does the job well. The app can detect up to five sound sources, and adjust their volume depending on their situation. You may select any of the five sources and the app will alert you if their volume is too high. It's possible to use the app to control the volume of the computer's speakers, headphones or a headset, and the app will auto-adjust its volume accordingly. If a sound source is not currently being used, you can also adjust its volume manually, and the app will notify you if the volume is too low or too high. The app will work with most audio cards, but it's only compatible with Windows 10 devices, including laptops and desktop PCs. The app includes a Help section that will teach you how to use it. One of the most useful features, in my opinion, is its ability to set an alarm volume level. This is quite useful when you're planning to go to bed or a long-time power-saving mode, and the app will warn you if its volume is too high. If the app is not compatible with your sound card, you'll be notified of it and you may install the developer's optional patch. A download button will be provided, but the patch is only available from the developer's website, and it's not available for all versions of Windows. The main drawback of the app is that its performance is quite slow. The UI works well and the app does its job quite well, but it's not smooth, and its responsiveness can be questionable at times. If you're looking for a more powerful and better performing app, Ear Mute is a better option.
